Collaborative action research is a powerful form of staff development because it is practice to theory rather than theory to practice. Teachers are encouraged to reach their own solutions and conclusions and this is far more attractive and has more impact than being presented with ideals which cannot be attained. (Linda Ross, New South Wales)

In Project LEARN's research with schools that were implementing collaborative action research, we have seen this pattern repeated over and over again. When the push for action research is initiated by administrators, the success and longevity of the effort is directly related to the support (tangible and emotional) that teachers receive from their leaders.

Collaborative Action Research and School Culture

Collaborative Action Research involves a systematic process of examining the evidence. The data analysis can be done by action researcher (s), but is more powerful when it is done with a group of people who are invested in the outcome. This type of research builds knowledge, informs theory, and changes practice.
